EspañolAs a Green Party member in New York City, I'm a firm believer that you should never vote for a politician who doesn't protect the environment. In the years to come, the country will not only depend on its federal and local governments, but also on green energy as the basis for a more sustainable economy and society. This week, the New York State Assembly voted to repeal the 2009 energy bill (S4200), which set forth the goal of reducing greenhouse gas emissions by 15 percent, relative to 2007 levels, by 2020. Backers of the bill said the measure was necessary to lower energy costs and improve the state's energy efficiency. But the bill was vetoed by the Senate on April 30, 2013. "The bill gives New York State the flexibility to meet the energy demands of the 21st century in a manner that is environmentally responsible, while also preserving reliable electricity supply and reasonable electricity rates for consumers," Governor Cuomo argued in an April 30 press release. "The bill will protect ratepayers from rising fuel costs while providing the flexible framework that will position our economy for future growth." The Senate originally approved the bill in June 2008, but the Assembly has since passed over 45 acts that would hinder the implementation of it. In a letter published in the New York State Journal, Assemblymembers Carmen Arroyo and Claudia Tenney wrote that the Assembly would, if passed, "pursue the repeal of this legislation every step of the way, including a court challenge." Assemblymember Arroyo explained her motive. "This bill, passed in 2008, was a mistake in the first place and has only become more a part of our lives since its passage." According to her office, the bill mandates high-efficiency appliances that are more expensive, burdensome and inconvenient than low-efficiency options. Furthermore, the bill limits consumers' rights and opportunities to choose alternate energy sources. "Instead of moving toward more efficient appliances, as the law mandates, consumers may instead be forced to choose less efficient options," Arroyo continued, adding that the law also prevents consumers from choosing alternatives, like solar energy. The Assemblywomen said they will fight for this law until they're not able to. "This bill has had a negative impact on our economy. We will not allow more mistakes like this to be repeated."
